Teaching Children About the Weather Using the Multiple Intelligences

By Andrea McKenna, Education Specialist

Weather is often an area of great interest to children, especially here in our area, where we have such diverse and unpredictable weather patterns. Learning about the weather can be a rich and meaningful experience for children, and yet often in child care programs weather is reduced to a chart the children discuss briefly during circle time.

Charting weather isn't a bad thing, but it only speaks to one type of learner and therefore is not meaningful to all the children in the group. Recently there has been a lot of rain in our area, which may prompt children to question or comment on rain. This is a great opportunity to begin a lesson on rain. Below is a list of the seven intelligences and ideas of activities related to rain for each type of learner.

Verbal/linguistic learners are good at expressing themselves with words. They like to hear or make up stories or rhymes. Reading a story like, Down Comes the Rain by Franklyn Branley, or having the children tell a story about their experiences in the rain are great activities for these types of learners.

Logical/mathematical learners enjoy solving problems. They might enjoy numbers, counting, and are quick to find patterns. These children enjoy charting how many days in a week it rained, or measuring the rain fall.

Visual/spatial learners enjoy putting together puzzles or building with blocks and they often draw or paint well. These children might like to paint a picture of a rainy landscape.

Bodily/Kinesthetic learners often show signs of advanced physical coordination. These children might make up a rain dance or go puddle jumping after a rain shower.

Musical/rhythmic learners love to create and listen to music. Activities for this type of learner might be mimicking the sound of raindrops falling on a window sill by playing on a xylophone or singing a song about rain like, "It's Raining, It's Pouring."

Interpersonal learners enjoy working and playing with other children and often learn well in group settings. These children might enjoy talking about the rain during circle, or dressing up in rain clothes in the dramatic play area.

Intrapersonal learners prefer to play alone. This child might enjoy watching the rain from a quiet cozy area in the classroom or looking at books about rain.

You have many different types of learners in your child care program so it is important to plan or facilitate activities that appeal to all different types of learners.

For more information on the multiple intelligences, read Howard Gardner's book, Frames of Mind, The Theory of Multiple Intelligences.

Body Benefits of Brown Rice

By: Jennifer Mehlenbacher, Food Program Specialist

Have you tried brown rice yet? Brown rice is a whole grain that provides more nutrients than white rice because only the outer inedible hull is removed. White rice, however, is the most highly polished rice with all the bran, germ, and many nutrients removed. All rice comes in three categories: long, short and medium-grain.

One cup of cooked long-grain brown rice provides 5 g of protein, less than 2 g of fat, and 3.5 g of fiber. It is a good source of selenium, phosphorous, niacin and magnesium. Brown rice may lower cholesterol and provide antioxidant protection. Brown rice may also help you maintain a healthy weight.

You can buy brown rice in bulk or prepackaged. Cooked brown rice will remain fresh for up to four days, and uncooked brown rice will keep for up to 6 months at room temperature, or longer if kept in the refrigerator. Brown rice does take longer to cook than white rice, so plan ahead when you try it.

Try the following recipe and see if you can change from using white rice to using mostly brown. Enjoy!

Cheesy Brown Rice Casserole

2 1/2 cups cooked brown rice	4 green onions, chopped
1 cup lowfat cottage cheese	1 tsp dill weed
1/4 cup parmesan cheese	1/2 cup milk
1/2 tsp Dijon mustard	Nonstick cooking spray

Combine cooked rice, chopped green onions, cottage cheese, dill weed, Parmesan cheese, milk, and mustard in a mixing bowl. Stir gently until well blended. Pour into casserole dish sprayed with nonstick cooking spray. Bake at 350 degrees for 15-20 minutes.

Do You Do Too Much for Your Kids?

By Tracy A Burnside, Legally Exempt Enrollment Specialist

Your 7 yr old just learned how to tie his shoes– but you do it for him because it’s faster. Or your high school child has left her assignment at home and so you are late for work because you take your daughter’s homework to her at school. Your 32 year old son is still living at home and does not have a steady job, you do his laundry for him and cook his meals.

You are probably ‘over-functioning’. You feel needed and they rely on you. But you may be teaching learned helplessness and taking away the opportunities for your kids to develop the skills necessary to function independently from ourselves. If you are doing too much for them then you will begin to feel burnt out, overwhelmed and resentful. Your own feelings of anxiety may be getting in your way.

There are some simple ways to help you break that cycle and grow successful and independent children.

- Recognize when you may fall into these behaviors.
- Step back and observe the roles in your family without jumping in to do it all yourself.
- Start NOW! Just do it– I mean, don’t do it for them. Start by taking little steps in helping them but don't take over for them.
- Expect some resistance initially from your kids. Change can be difficult, encourage them to try more on their own. Let them know you are there and support them but that they need to try to figure it out their own way.
- Don’t let the guilt get you. It may be painful to watch your child struggle a bit.
- Allow the natural consequences to happen– it’s the best lesson. Children are very resilient. They will learn how to pick themselves up when they fail.... If we allow them to.

Are you helping your child, or teaching your child helplessness?

Is it in my child’s best interest?

Immunization and Health Updates

By Emily Leone RN, MSN Health Services Coordinator

Two important immunization updates:

1) New Public Health Law amendment requires licensed and registered child care programs to post in plain view influenza (flu) educational material within their facilities.

Public health officials recommend that everyone over the age of 6 months get the influenza vaccine to protect themselves and those close to them from becoming infected with the flu. Unfortunately, immunization rates are low and therefore infants, children, and adults become needlessly very ill and sometimes die from influenza.

A nasal spray form of the influenza vaccine is now available for those over the age of two years who do not have a chronic respiratory illness such as asthma.

2) The Department of Health Immunization Survey will now be due March 5, 2012 rather than in October of 2011. The immunization survey will be available in early February 2012. The immunization survey is required by Group Family Child Care programs and Child Care Centers. Family and School-age programs do not need to complete the survey.

The Department of Health is creating an online child day care survey and will be actively recruiting Child Care Centers to submit their immunization surveys on-line. Group Family Child Care providers will also be encouraged to submit their surveys on-line as well. Group Family and Child Care Centers interested in submitting their immunization survey online can call 518-474-1944 or email osas@health.state.ny.us.

"The Book Nook" Professional Library Book Review

By Staff Member: Jodi Holgado,
Food Program Specialist

Rookie Dad Susan Fox

Many dad's don't know how to bond with their baby despite their strong desire to do so. They feel that mom takes the stage during the pregnancy and once the baby arrives, dad has a hard time feeling able to bond. Rookie Dad, (2001) by Pediatric Therapist, Susan Fox, encourages the most excited, as well as the reluctant, dads to actively participate in the bonding experience with their baby until the age of 1.

This book offers simple and enjoyable games for dads and babies. Each game is grouped by the age of the child. This easy-read is geared toward sports-enthusiast-dads, using sports terminology throughout the book, such as "Pregame Show," "The Handoff: When Mom Leaves You Alone With the Baby" and "Major League Milestone: When Your Baby Sits Up." The easy games in this book are demonstrative of things a father can do to interact and feel that they are helping in the development of their baby. Safety is of utmost importance and the author stresses that in every chapter, reminding dad to be careful of supporting the baby's head or other safety tips appropriate to the activity. Not only does the book cover how to bond, and how to get through the times when mom is exhausted, or what to bring when dad goes out alone with the baby, it touches on the basics every dad needs to know such as feeding, changing, burping, and sleep. This book will definitely help any dad feel prepared and ready to bond with their little one. Rookie Dad is must have for any new dad, or even seasoned dads looking for a way to bond some more with their baby.
